

As the MPAA, and the RIAA know, copy protection will always be broken. Wherever there is a door, there is always a way in. If there is no back door, one can be made. Copy protection is nothing more than an annoyance, and sooner or later, like DVD's CSS encrytion, it can be broken. I am not in favor of copy protection on HDTV. I do know that if this law is passed, then sooner or later, the scheme will be broken, and the consumer will once again be able to watch what they pay too much for.
